(57): A network schedules a mobile station for an uplink packet transmission on a data channel, receives from a mobile station an uplink message on a control channel, determines from the uplink message a desired power for the mobile station to transmit on the data channel, and thereafter transmits to the mobile station a power control message that commands either a zero power allocation or full power allocation for the scheduled uplink packet transmission. The mobile station receives from the network the power control message, then determines from the power control message whether zero or full power is allocated. If zero power, then the mobile station suspends its transmissions on the data channel until receiving a new power control command for uplink transmissions on the data channel. If full power, the mobile station transmits user data on the data channel without regard to power on a control channel.

(54) Title: FEVER MANAGER

(57) Fever Manager is a product for controlling and managing fever. Unlike anti-fever medications, FM does not suppress fever but maintains fever within comfortable limits. A lot of current medical research discourage fever treatment and support the idea of managing fever. FM can be "fine tuned" and adjusted to keep temperature at an optimum balance between immediate discomfort and longer term discomfort. Its recommended for patients vomiting excessively and not able to retain oral fever medication. It is used to control patients with a history of febrile convulsions and allergic to acetaminophen or ibuprofen.
