(54) PRESERVATIVE FOR BIOLOGICAL SPECIMEN

(51)

(57) An embalming fluid, a chemical composition comprising chemicals that are, generally, non-hazardous to humans in the concentrations used. Also, specimens preserved in the composition look and feel more life-like than specimens preserved in formaldehyde based compositions. All medicinal herbs can be administered through intravenous injection or dripping after photochemical decomposing with this new preservative. Photochemical decomposing simply means the mixture of the pounded herb with this new preservative is exposed to the sunlight in a sealed transparent glass. It is supposed to be sealed since this chemical readily evaporates with increased heat. After a specified number of hours in the sunlight, the synthesized product is sieved to remain with liquid medicine and solid residue. Depending on the medical property of the herb, for example, if the herb constitutes of Quinine then in administering the new preservative, protozoa called plasmodium is going to be destroyed hence treating malaria. Several medicinal herbs that treat different diseases can be pounded then photochemical decomposed with the preservative in order to obtain a multi-purpose dose of general application that can combat a variety of diseases. The preservative keeps intact anaerobic life of an organism since it is non-poisonous to living cells hence a substitute for formaldehyde.
